The following errors were present in this article as originally published:

A question mark was missing from the end of the first sentence under the “General Discussion” section.

The fifth sentence in the “Theoretical Opportunities” section read (incorrectly):

This is because (1) the common-in-group bond is likely weakened as a result of the of lesbian women who are so inclined...

Instead of (correctly):

This is because (1) the common-in-group bond is likely weakened as a result of lesbian women who are so inclined...

In the last sentence in the “Theoretical Opportunities” section read (incorrectly):

So, although the current findings provide a promising start, future studies could aim to test the derived assumptions directly, by, for example, extending our propositions to reactions toward lesbians and transgendered victims of hate crime such studies could also examine reactions toward norm conforming versus norm-deviating heterosexual victims.

Instead of (correctly):

So, although the current findings provide a promising start, future studies could aim to test the derived assumptions directly, by, for example, extending our propositions to reactions toward lesbians and transgendered victims of hate crime. Such studies could also examine reactions toward norm conforming versus norm-deviating heterosexual victims.

The original article has been corrected.
