The RISE of the PUBLIC LIBRARY in CALIFORNIA

by Ray E. Held

American Library Association

50 East Huron Street • Chicago, Illinois 60611

This highly readable book contains diverse and scattered source material to show how public library development on the state level may be systematically described.

Professor Held analyzes the constitutional background, economic conditions, historical precedents, and philanthropic activities which influenced the founding of California municipal, county, and state libraries. Not only the origins and early concepts of improved service are shown, but also the vision and efforts of early California librarianship are portrayed with the stresses and compromises that accompany institutional changes.

The activities of the state association and labors of pioneering figures like James Gillis are detailed. In addition, the beginning of reference work service to children and of branch libraries are described.

An essential book for students of library history and an important one in social history and the history of California.

SOURCES OF INFORMATION IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

A Guide to the Literature

— Second Edition, Revised

CARL M. WHITE AND ASSOCIATES

This superbly organized guide to the literature of the social sciences is a prime selection tool for collection development and as a guide for reference librarians, scholars, and students. As the 2d edition of the 1964 publication, this work has been extensively augmented, revised, and updated to include books published through 1972. It contains an expanded index with a thorough subject approach and adds a chapter on geography.

In addition to an outstanding introduction to the study of social science bibliography that concentrates on leading interdisciplinary works, subsequent chapters deal individually with the literature of history, geography, economics and business administration, sociology, anthropology, psychology, education, and political science . . . all held in focus by repeated cross-references. Each chapter is prepared by a leading subject and reference specialist.
