A long time ago, there was a boy named Oliver who often listened to exciting news on the radio. This boy had an older brother who was a journalist. When he left for school, he saw his older brother preparing a news story and told him, “I want to become a journalist.”

His older brother replied, “It is a good job.”

Then Oliver said, “To become a journalist, I will have to work hard.”

His brother then said, “First, you have to study.” Oliver answered that he would study hard.

When he arrived at school, his teacher asked him, “What do you want to be when you grow up?”

He responded, “I want to be a journalist.”

The teacher said, “That is a good choice.”

Oliver studied hard, finished secondary school, and attended university. After he graduated, he became a radio and television reporter in Rwanda. He worked on the Games Program, in which he reported the news about sports on Rwandan television. After doing this for a while, he became a journalist of national news.

After making a few mistakes, he corrected himself and went on with his job. When you correct yourself, you reach your goals without problems.
