Introduction

Nowadays, the English language is considered the main means of communication in the world economy. Likewise, all large international companies, organizations, and businesses conduct most of their activities in English. For example, such global companies as Google, Apple, and Microsoft use English as their primary language of internal and external communication services.

Especially in the field of banking and finance, most international accounts, agreements, and reports are carried out in English. Moreover, most international conferences, economic forums, and trade seminars are also held mainly in English. These factors show that having knowledge of English is one of the most important conditions for participation in the modern global economy.

Statistics show that more than 1.5 billion people around the world use this language, and it is considered an official language in over 50 countries. The most influential organizations, such as the United Nations (UN), the World Bank, and the International Monetary Fund (IMF), also recognize English as their main working and communication language.

This indicates that English has become the dominant medium for international communication. In addition, in trade and business relations between different countries, English serves as the universal language of international communication. This can be clearly seen in trade contracts, export–import documents, advertisements, and marketing materials prepared in English.

The English language is an integral part of the global economy, as it facilitates international economic relations and cooperation, and contributes to the development of global trade. English is not only a means for people to express their feelings and emotions to one another, but also a strategic resource for economic growth. It not only unites the international market but also serves as a key factor for attracting new investments, promoting cooperation, and fostering innovation. In general, the English language and economics together are forming an inseparable and perfect field of human progress.
